

I believe that the NAB is doing this to try to keep a monopoly. I use these reports when I travel. I can sit in my car on the way to the airport and find out where problems are in the town I'm going to. Without this service I would have no way of doing this short of getting online and searching for it. If the information is available online then what is the difference in having it available for our paid service? Maybe the FCC should focus on the fact that now we live in an information society. Would the next thing be that we cant use our cell phones? After all I can get traffic on that also.
